WHAT IS RUST CORROSION?

Corrosion is more or less the same as rust formation or rusting. Rust is the product we get when iron goes through the corrosion process. Iron and steel are not found free in nature. Iron and steel are extracted from iron ore in a blast furnace or electro oven. Large amounts of energy are introduced into the iron ore in order to extract the iron, and consequently the iron has a great tendency to corrode back to its natural form "iron oxide" or RUST.

RUST IS BREAKING OUT.

IT'S UP TO YOU TO CAGE IT IN?

We can compare iron and steel to a wild caged animal, which finds itself trapped in a cage, it will do anything in its power to escape.

The energy trapped in all iron and steel can be compared to a charged battery. The iron and steel can also set free its accumulated energy in the form of electricity in the same manner as an electric torch battery when connected to an electric light bulb. When the battery runs down the zinc capsule around the battery is consumed and the liquid electrolyte runs out. This zinc capsule is also called the anode.

Exactly the same thing happens to a piece of steel.

Some areas of the steel are consumed or corroded during the release of energy.
